My research is focused on infant and toddler learning and development in the Development, and Education, where a vibrant community of students and faculty work together to advance knowledge in this field. Yet studies based on immigrant Latino families and their children in the U.S. have been lacking. The PhD in Counseling Psychology program is designed to train the next generation of psychologists and provide clinical services to people across the developmental lifespan. I am particularly interested in working with individuals from diverse cultural backgrounds and communities, and I emphasize community-based interventions.
